

An Invitation to Spouses & Partners

When my husband, Dan, began exploring the possibility of doing business in China he made several exploratory trips before I could join him. I was fortunate that the trip I finally did join him on was the one of which his future business partner, James Lee, hosted and had made many of the travel arrangements.

In a very short period of time, Dan and I received a first-hand immersion in the entrepreneurial end of the Chinese business culture, which was even more fascinating and vastly different than I had expected. We also had an opportunity to visit some of the major, “can’t be missed,” sights like the Great Wall including a few lesser known, but equally interesting, places chosen by James on the basis of our personal interests. I will tell a few stories and show some pictures at the information sessions for this trip!

In short, if your spouse or partner does business in China, or is considering business in China, and travels there periodically, you probably won’t be able (or even want) to accompany him or her on every trip. But, you really do need to go ONCE in order to get a bit of a first-hand feel for what China is really like. I can guarantee this trip will be the perfect way to go to China one time and get an incredible introduction to the culture, the entrepreneurial business climate and the major, must-see tourist sites.

If you have some degree of interest in business, a moderate sense of adventure and a desire to have a realistic understanding and personal interaction with the Chinese culture, you should really consider coming on this trip.

Sincerely,

Marge Cunningham
